The Truth About Beauty In an interview about her new book, "Becoming Beautiful", published by Crown, Salzman says beauty companies are now testing their products on teens, often on low-paid employees in developing countries, to see how they react. "Our skin is the organ that helps us interact with the world around us and reflects what's going on in our lives," says Salzman. "This is the first book to explore the truth about beauty. The beauty industry tells us we need to fix our skin to look younger, but there is so much more to it." Salzman, who has been working on the book since she was a teenager, says the beauty industry's complex relationships with the cosmetics, pharmaceutical and drug companies have also shaped the way people perceive beauty. "Companies benefit from selling us more products, even if they don't work," Salzman says. "Beauty companies have been working for a long time to sell products. If a product doesn't work, they will find a reason to say it did. And most people believe their beauty experts because they are experts." Salzman also says that while women are feeling pressured to strive for beauty, men aren't concerned with looking pretty – and often aren't sure what beauty means. "Men are concerned with the short term – making money and having fun," she says. "Women are concerned with the short term – whether a man is attracted to them." In recent years, a range of products have begun to market to men, including an entire line of deodorants and some facial creams. "Men are used to women focusing on their appearance," says Salzman. "They are not used to looking for the reason their bodies feel good." 82157476af
