I've seen similar posts here before, but they are all referring to the fact that more companies than ever have music libraries available to them. I was reading a book in my free time about ethics and copyright and this topic kept coming up. Let's say that someone produces a software program and applies for a copyright on that software. What I don't understand is how it is possible that someone could then get a company to produce a replacement of that software for free. If the person who produced the software program then applies for a copyright on it, they will probably only be able to get the right to distribute it, but not the right to create a free version. This sounds like a problem with companies that are only interested in making money, even though the product is free to the end user. 1 Answer 1 82157476af
